Quivering in the ice of a January night, the moon - encircled by a necklace of stars - looked down on the stirring city below. Beneath its indifferent gaze, the station was slowly woken from its night's slumber by the arrival of yawning passengers and the blossoming steam of the day's first trains. However, in the silence of the frozen night, not everything had been still...

Darting furtively amongst the darker shadows of the grand, marble station concourse - gelid from the night's icy breath - was a boy. He scuttled surreptitiously toward an ornately decorated vent cover and paused; he vanished.

The great, arched ceiling (oblivious to the boy's movement) shuddered into view as the main lights flickered into life; the station inspector was beginning his first round of the day. A gentle but icy breeze seemed to sweep last night's litter from his path: this was an important man.
